

Ankle Brachial (ABI) Testing

A test that uses ultrasound to detect peripheral vascular disease. This test uses doppler in conjunction with a series of arm and leg blood pressure cuffs to measure blood flow in the limbs. This test is most commonly used to determine if leg pain is the result of poor circulation in the legs (claudication). Because these tests use ultrasound and not x-rays, they are completely safe. These procedures do not require any preparation.

